Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Cupid and Commonsense: A Play in Four Acts At the outset I must ask permission to give a few personal details in order to indicate clearly the standpoint from which I write. Before launching myself in the profession of letters, I was engaged for some ten years in various business offices, during which time I received a fairly complete training in business methods; I have conducted a business. For five years I was dramatic critic for several London papers in turn, and in this capacity I attended nearly every first night from 1895 to 1900. I count several West End theatrical managers and leading actors among my friends, and I have talked at great length with them under circumstances in which they would not be likely to talk as though to an interviewer. I have written, or collaborated in, about a dozen plays, five of which I have sold to West End managers and received money for, and two of which were commissioned. None of these plays has ever been performed; my sole representations in a London theatre have owed nothing to the reckless daring of any manager.
