Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: .mistaken for a Tiger, you may suppose that ever afterwards he was looked upon as a Lion: and in truth, if ever a donkey was a Lion he was. Everybody came to look at him, --and no one could look at him without laughing; and fewer could look upon his young master, dressed in his top boots, without laughing a great deal more. After this, Neddy led a quiet life for some time; the only duty he was called upon to perform being that of conveying his young master about, down dusty roads, or dirty lanes. As to thistles, --not being a Scotch donkey, he had no national feeling towards them: as to grass, he cared little about it.--He was a gentleman s donkey now, and could afford to eat oats and beans. He wanted to be free, and tried to gnaw the rope that bound him; so when he was caught at his tricks, he pretended to be very hungry; he was not, however. The young gentleman thought that he could not feed a donkey too much; and especially as he could take as much of his father s corn as he liked, without asking leave; so Neddy was fed with corn four times a day. There was no end to Neddy s eating. He grew sleek and fat; he was no longer the rough hardy animal he used to be; his coat was combed, his fetlocks clipped, his hoofs polished; and the young gentleman...
