What a fine slate and what a proper time is this fop talking of the excesses of ministers, of the injury of the constitution, of the vices of the age, of the wise and sober measures to be adopted, , . and of the general necessity for retrenchment and reform. Full of the subject, and of the liquor imbibed, and pleased with the liberty of the press, this free-thinking patriot returns home, persuaded, that John Bull will swallow all his rhetoric. He then examines his cellar with partial eye also, and doubles his political views by an additional bottle; thus drowning his own cares and those of the people at the same time. . What a rare conductor of the judgement of the people! what a clear and perspicuous foresight he must have! liow implicitly may the nation depend on his...
