Excerpt: . (107) brother to kill their common tyrant. (108) The young (109) maiden who was (110) urged to this tremendous deed by an impulse which overpowered its horror was evidently a most gentle amiable being--a creature formed to adorn to be admired (111). Such a story, if (112) told, so as to present to the reader (113) all the feelings of those who once acted it, (114) the progress of their fears (115) and hopes, their confidences (116) and misgivings (117) the exaltation of hardened crime, the terror, the heartsick agony, (118) wd be as a light to (119) make apparent some of the most dark secret (120) caverns of (121) the human heart but when I consider how (122) powerfully superstitions customary (123) persuasions (124) had acted to render intolerable what appears even (100) of a (101) having who (102) Towards the rest...
